

It was originally thought that depression results in inflammation of the brain

However, we now know that the opposite occurs: neurons increase CD200 and CD47 levels, thereby suppressing microglia